We are interested in seeing if we can create a more detailed database of all the checks performed and the findings. This is the kind of thinking we need in the credit union movement. The NCUA also instituted a new rule regarding access points that are in branches. If you have been to a branch recently, you may have noticed the sign saying “Client Access”. This is to let the public know that the bank or credit union would like to see what they need to do to open a new account or update a current account. For the most part, this is a good thing. Some branch executives and managers, however, are not giving that sign enough thought. Why not give the public the opportunity to update accounts and open accounts by posting the form on their own computers or phones and then uploading it into the branch system? While the credit union is seeing the extra computer terminals, the branch manager sees the new account openings and things like this help drive income. Now a new idea is needed – one that provides the opportunity for the consumer to update accounts at least once each year. That’s a way to add value to the consumers and perhaps keep the branch open a little longer. On a similar note, we would like to see the NCUA also institute a rule that requires all the consumer feedback received be shared with the consumer. That way those big name credit unions can watch what’s being said about them on the internet or who is complaining on the telephone.

Together, we can build on the foundation that so many American foundations have already laid to expand the breadth of climate action through support for policy change, technology for resilience, and awareness of the science and impacts.” Hildreth and other leaders from the community foundation community are spending the next few days in San Francisco meeting with other funders and donors. They will spend the last two days of July at the annual meeting of the Community Foundations' Institute and the American Philanthropy Association's Research Symposium. “The 3da54e8ca3
