Here's the situation: I need to run some tasks at a certain interval. The thing is that the tasks don't work if they're scheduled in a way where they start running as soon as a user logs on to the computer. When I schedule them, I need to trigger the task after a certain interval of time has passed. Is there some way to do this? A: Use TEvent for this, the AutoReset event is what you want. It fires when the current control procedure returns to the point at which it was paused (see TEvent.SetEvent()), which will be after the end of any function that calls TEvent.SetWaitInterval(). Use TTimer if you really need to set the time between runs to zero but I hope that won't be necessary. Create a TEvent and TTimer instance on the same thread (or the main thread), make the TTimer variable volatile, and they will share the same event. If you want to cancel the event when the task is executing, simply put a breakpoint on the line calling TEvent.SetEvent(). That will pause execution of the code until the breakpoint is reached, which won't be before the Task Scheduler runs the task, so you'll know that your code can be paused for the task to run, and then resumed when the task is done. The signs went up just after 8:30 a.m. Friday morning, but the four items that were posted to the top of the Boulder County Courthouse quickly garnered a lot of attention. “Alone at a Laundromat on a Friday morning” could be seen up above the Boulder County Courthouse, while “I Will Fight for My Country,” “Transgender Rights,” and ♦
