The door is being shut on a decade-long fundraising campaign to build a national women's gallery, but the New Zealand Women's Art Display needs your support while it's still open. Photo: Supplied / Alexander Turnbull Library Last year the Royal Australian Institute put out a request for expressions of interest to look after a national collection of artworks by women. The National Gallery of Victoria was an early participant but then it became clear that the exhibition needs to be a permanent fixture of the artwork collection. About a year ago the Auckland Art Gallery and Auckland War Memorial Museum approached the artists' committee of the NZ Women's Art Display to ask if this was still an interest. It turns out that it was. The committee has now begun to research how and where to go about making this happen. As people know, the NZ Women's Art Display was first conceived in 2002 by Stefania d'Arrigo, Astrid Dalmata and Sue Calway. It was a set of bi-annual touring exhibitions open to women artists from all around the world. It started in 2002 with exhibits at The Centre of Contemporary Art, Otago South and Bunnock Studio

With the season's first catwalk collections having been released, interviews with designers including Joe Reyes, Ermias Aboab and Ashley Smith are being released on the retailer's website. The interviews feature a new "Designers' Project", where a given designer is asked to answer key questions – such as "What does design mean to you?" – for which they are invited to discuss their philosophy, influences and approach to design. The designs created for the project are then unveiled in an exhibition, and on the retailer's website. The campaign – in association with branding agency SVA – is designed to draw attention to the fact that retailers are united in their pursuit of quality, and recognises that design has become a major part of the business. For an inspiring look at the possibilities, take a look at Ashley Smith's inaugural Designer Project.Q: C program output not giving expected This program should take four input numbers and output their sum, product, difference,

Instruction The VFILL instruction is well-known to be part of Floating Point Load instructions in FPU. This instruction is defined to perform exactly what the name indicates: filling up the vector with new values from the next instruction. For great part, VFILL is similar to MOV except that it removes the previous values in the vector. VFILL fills up the vector with NaN, so that MOV does not move any previous value. However, there is one interesting difference between them: when it is a load instruction and the vector is subnormal, VFILL will silently discard the previous value. For example, let say there is a vector with 20 elements, 9 of them are zero, and 3 of them have values of 1.3 (or 1.27). Say, you need to read the 3 values, and the result of the load is 3, 1.3 and 1.3, which is similar to the normal load (read 3 2.1 2.3 2.3 and fill them up with NaN). In this case, VFILL will silently discard the original value and leave the new value. This may be reasonable because it is possible that our CPU does not have enough hardware for binary operations, so if there is no previous value to compute, we can just fill up with NaN to re-use the hardware. This makes the previous value unused, so it is safe to discard it. LAG instruction The counter part of VFILL is LAG instruction. If you want to adjust the vector and get the result as same as before the counter part, you can use the LAG instruction. For example, if the vector A with 2.1, 0, 0.3, 0 and it is supposed to be filled up with 3 values after you do LAG operations, the result will be 2.1, 0, 2.1, 0.3 and 2.1, 0, 0.3. Though this is very simple, the detailed signal flow will be changed (as shown in the diagram). For basic counter part instruction, there is load and store instructions. As much as they do the same job, the instruction type is different. The load is defined to get the data and store the values. For better utilization of system resources, some systems use a constant pool to store values that can be reused as constants. It is possible that the constant values can be reused for the same use and the previous value in
